Agnes Jerome wouldn't have known the path through the woods was there! "Did she know about the path, Katy?" Deputy Sheriff Dave Argus asked.

Katy Elmo shook her head. "I don't know. She might have known, I suppose."

"Of course she could have known about the path," Ted Jordan spoke angrily. "Agnes had lived around here all her life. She could have heard of it—she might even have walked it sometime. And what was to keep her from finding it the night she was killed?"

Dave shrugged. "But she probably didn't know about it and even if she did, I doubt if she was familiar enough with this woods to want to walk it in pitch darkness. No," he shook his head. "I think Miss Jerome was waylaid between the road and the house—on the lane probably — and her body was dropped off the foot bridge. Maybe the murderer hoped it would be called an accidental death from a fall on those rocks."

It was a straw and Katy grasped it. "It could have been! Oh, it must have been!"

"Katy, Katy!" Ted cried. "Don't you see what Dave's doing to you? He's trying to make it seem like you did it!" Then, "I won't have it, Dave. You let Katy alone!"

Dave Argus didn't even bother to laugh, but there was a twinkle deep in his voice. "Come out of it, Ted. Nobody's accusing Katy of anything."

"Of course not, Ted," Katy tried to sound as if she believed it. Ted growled, "Just see that you don't." He felt for his pipe, found it on the mantel, leaned over to tap it on an andiron, and then tamped fresh tobacco into its fragrant bowl, all very deliberately. When he finished, he could say see Katy pushed around."

It was 10:30 when the two men left together. Dave...

and made a garage. Beside Major stirred, and a growl deep in his barrel chest. There a movement, out there

There was, Katy knew, all she didn't see it. Major's bone seemed to rise, sharp through his coat. She thought "He's come back—the killer come back!"

She ran through the house the front hall. Ted's number her mind groped for it a snatched up the telephone had said the killer might back. After an eternity, she sized what was happening.

was hearing absolutely nothing her own frightened breathing "live" sound of an open telephone line, no operator, nothing!

"Major!" she cried then. "Come with me!"

Halfway to town, with erect in the seat beside her the road unrulling behind her like a dirty gray ribbon from runaway spool, she realized could not go to Ted. Not like this!

She was wearing her ch robe and scuffed bedroom slippers and no make-up but her going to Ted like this was possible. Heavens! she thought Mrs. Porter—dear correct Al Porter—would be horrified, not so horrified that her chatt tongue would be stilled.
