

Senator Garrett, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke as follows:

Mr. President: In these days of increasing varieties of pursuits and increasing complexities, the lives of the good and strong of character are an inspiration to all of us.

Of those who have left their mark upon the pages of our state's history there are few who have set a higher standard than Samuel McNutt.

He was of the plain people, believing in the dignity of true manhood, devotion and loyalty to his home, his friends, and his country.

To these he gave the full measure of life's service.

The world is richer because of his faithful life.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously by a rising vote.

Senator Jewell from a Special Committee submitted the following report and moved its adoption:

While a Senator he secured the adoption of statutory provision under which persons applying for opportunity to teach special subjects are allowed to take examination for such specialty without being required to take a general examination. In 1876 Mr. Johnson was an elector for President and Vice President, casting his vote for Hayes and Wheeler. In 1884 he removed to the territory of Dakota, and there entered the land which was his home to the last. He was prosecuting attorney for a couple of years, and was president of the body that drafted the Constitution of the State of North Dakota. In this convention he resolutely contended against a bicameral legislature, making a strong fight for a legislature with only one house, citing as precedent many other states and countries, including that of his ancestors, Norway. The convention, however, adopted the plan of a legislature with two bodies. When the first legislature met Mr.
